Pride of Ownership

by Susan Wilson

They saunter in, in their twos and threes, from near and far throughout the campground, carrying their lawn chairs. Young boys full of beans whiz back and forth along the driveway on their small bicycles. A bevy of long-legged teenage girls arrive in a pack, one of them toting a videocamera. Friends greet each other with hugs. Cameras click over and over to the record the day for the family album. The air is filled with the banter of a community.

People settle into their lawn chairs, waiting to see what will happen next. Clowns come by to general applause, leading a troupe of costumed youngsters on their decorated bikes and one decorated cocker spaniel. Speeches are made: George Simmons, Warden of Haliburton County, and Lewis Stevens, Deputy Reeve of Anson, Hindon, and Minden, bring greetings and congratulations. Special guests Murray and Helen Robertson are welcomed. A song is sung. Plaques are presented. A ribbon is cut. Champagne is drunk.

After a year of hard work and some serious nail-biting, the Northern Eagle Campground Association is celebrating the realization of a dream.

Northern Eagle has a long history of welcoming summer visitors, as they used to be known. It started during World War I when people who had braved the rough roads up from the city asked George and Georgina Robertson if they could pitch a tent in their fields on the south shore of Lake Kashawigamog and would Mrs. Robertson fix their meals. It was so nice, they came back the next year, and the next. And they brought their friends. Finally, they talked George into providing more permanent accommodation. In 1922, he constructed a large two-storey addition on the west side of his brick farmhouse and the Northern Eagle Farm Summer Home was born.

Two decades later, their son Murray built a white frame house on the property for himself and his bride, Helen, and they helped his parents run the farm and the summer hotel. But the cottaging boom and the rising dominance of the automobile eroded resort businesses everywhere. In 1955, two years after George had passed away, they closed the hotel. When Georgina died in 1960, both the old brick farmhouse and the adjoining accommodation stood vacant.

Several years passed during which the Robertsons weren't quite sure what to do with the property. They only knew they didn't want to sell it for waterfront development. Then Murray got the idea, after seeing people paying to pitch their tents in a rocky field near Duck Lake, that people might be willing to pay to pitch their tents at his place, just as they had done so many years ago. And so, in 1965, the Northern Eagle Campground was born. Murray made the lower floor of the hotel into a recreation hall. Soon the tents became trailers and the modern life of the park began.

Gary Lambert, Derek Rewbury, and Linda Rowland (left) gave up their summer last year to organize the campers at Northern Eagle into an association to buy the campground and preserve their little bit of Highlands heaven. At the official opening on July 4th, (below) Lewis Stevens, Deputy Reeve of Anson, Hindon, and Minden, and George Simmons, Warden of Haliburton County, did the honours at the ribbon-cutting with a large pair of garden shears. Getting the ribbon cut proved to be the one of the most amusing parts of the whole day because it turned out the shears weren't very sharp.

In 1977, the Robertsons sold the campground along with the brick house and their own white house, to Godfrey and Marie Saunders, who had decided to get out of the rat-race in Lindsay. Maybe they didn't realize that running a campground takes about 100 hours a week during high season. Ten years later, they sold to their son and daughter-in-law, Craig Saunders and Melissa Stephens. Although Craig had been involved in the campground since he was 12 years old, perhaps full-time ownership proved to be something else again. Anyway, a couple of years ago, he started to think seriously about selling.

"It ruined our summer, but it was worth it." With those words, Gary Lambert summed up the several feverish months of activity that he and Linda Rowland and Derek Rewbury put in last year as they strove to ensure the future of the campground.

"Two summers ago, there were rumours that the park might be sold," Gary explains. "And in the spring of last year, the rumours got worse. So I asked Craig Saunders point blank and he said there was an offer on the table. Derek's brother is in real estate and he checked out the situation for us. It turned out that the plan was to subdivide the property and put up 2,500-square-foot cottages. The drawings were already done. We all would have been out of here. So I started asking around to see who else might be interested in forming an association to buy the park and keep it as a campground."

Derek picks up the story. "A friend of mine at work had been involved in a venture like this near Port Severn. There are lots of similar arrangements out there. I know of a couple of very successful ones in Florida," he explains. "And we've since learned of associations like this on Eagle Lake and Loon Lake. But we picked Port Severn as our model because it's close, it's appropriate to our situation, and it worked."

"It ruined our summer, but it was worth it."

"So I got hold of the lawyer who put that deal together and we got permission from the Port Severn people to take what we needed from their legal documentation. We knew that, if this thing was going to work, we needed to have a lawyer people would trust."

Linda says that the attitude of the people in the park to their idea was initially very mixed. "There was a lot of apprehension, but as the momentum picked up, that changed. And thank goodness! The three of us had put in an offer and it was our assets on the line, so to speak, if we couldn't sell this proposition to the other campers."

Derek, Linda, and Gary come by their commitment to Northern Eagle honestly.

When Derek was young, his parents camped in a tent-trailer all over Ontario and, when he grew up, he continued the pattern. "I don't think there's a provincial park I haven't been in," he says. "I just like exploring. Anyway, my parents had taken eight-millimetre films of some of the places we'd stayed and one day I found myself watching the one of Northern Eagle. So we started coming up here for two weeks every August while my son went to the Haliburton hockey camp. Then my parents started coming here too. Soon it became a family affair for us. I like the sense you have here of being up north, with the lake and the woods. But there's lots to do in the area, so the kids can keep themselves amused."

"My parents have trailered at Miner's Bay Lodge since I was 12 years old," Linda begins. "One day, I decided my husband and I should buy a trailer too. He didn't think it was such a great idea, but I saw an ad in the paper and went out and got a loan and bought it. And we spent the winter refinishing it. Then we drove all around the area looking for a campground to park it in. We liked this place because of the scenery and because there were lots of young kids for our children to play with. My husband was still kind of hostile to the idea, but he hadn't had a holiday in five years and I said, you'll thank me for this one day. And he does."

Gary started out wanting to put a pool in his back yard, then changed his mind and decided they should buy a cottage. When they found out what cottages cost, they started to rethink their plans again. "I knew Linda's cousin," he continues, "and she told me about this place. But I still thought of trailer parks as places for second-class transients. When I came here, though, I found the people really friendly. So this is our 'cottage'. And the best part is, there's no phone and no hustle and bustle — that is, not until you decide to buy the park."

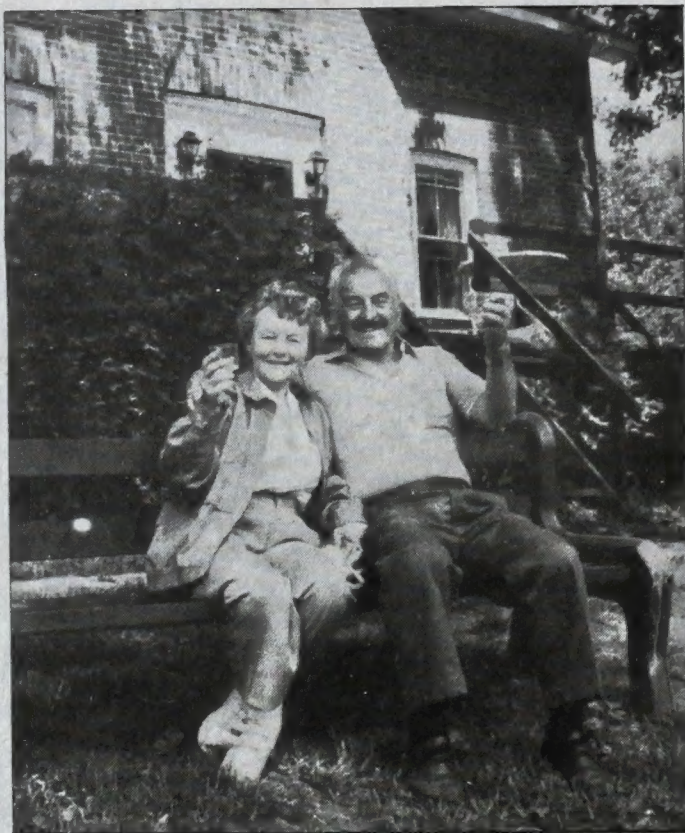

Having done their homework and signed on the dotted line, the three spent every Saturday during June, July, and August holding meetings in the recreation hall explaining and re-explaining the proposal to the campers and bringing them up-to-date. "And they'd show up on your doorstep at nine in the morning to talk about it some more," Gary says. "Or they'd follow you out to the raft on the lake. It was tough. People had a lot of different ideas about how to do it and you'd have to explain once again the pitfalls of that way and the benefits of our way."

On the Labour Day weekend, the three held a seminar for all the people in the campground. Their lawyer was present to field the technical questions. They explained once again how forming an association and selling shares in it would work. With each of the 105 shares would go one lot. They explained that they could afford to buy it for less than the other interested party because, since it would be continuing as a business, the vendor would not be liable for capital gains tax, as he would in the other deal. The Saunders would get the same net amount of money; only Revenue Canada would be out some cash.

"People looked at us and said, what's in it for you?" Gary recalls. "What was in it for us was being able to come back here. But just in case people didn't go for it, we had a Plan B. Fortunately we didn't need it. After the seminar was over and we had finished our presentation and people had asked all their questions, we invited them to come up and sign on. They had one week to put a deposit on their lots; after that, they'd be available for anyone to purchase. We didn't know what would happen, but soon there was a line-up of people waiting to sign up and that was when the momentum started."

"Our magic number was 58 campsites, but our goal was 71. That day we sold 37 and by the end of the season, in mid-October, we had reached 72 of the 105. We finally knew for sure it was going to work."

Craig Saunders is glad things worked out the way they did too. "I mean, business is business," he said recently, "but you feel a sense of responsibility too. Some of these people have been coming to Northern Eagle since before I was born. This way, they're able to stay and we still got what we wanted out of it. I'm really pleased about how things worked out."

Helen and Murray Robertson, owners of the campground until 1977, raise a glass of champagne in a toast to the success of the campground association. Behind them is the 125-year-old brick house Murray grew up in.

Once the deal was closed, a Board of Directors was formed. Not surprisingly, the three instigators found themselves on it: Derek is President, Linda and Gary are Vice Presidents. People were then invited to sign up for various committees: Social, Environmental, Beautification, and Kids' Day. "They run their ideas past the Board," Linda explains, "and then they go ahead and do it. And people are taking so much more ownership for the whole place. They're cutting grass, for instance, on the vacant lots so the park will look good. We're trying to get the white house ready to rent and people are just going in there and working on it on their own initiative."

A lot of work went into getting the park ready for opening day. Brian Luckie, hired this winter as the new manager, has spent many hours getting the hot water system functioning and fixing up the washrooms and generally tarting up the place. "Craig came over," he says, "and went around with me to show me where all the pipes run and how all the mechanical equipment works. It sure made my job a lot easier."

The maintenance crew, campers all, spent a week working in the rain in the days leading up to the opening ceremonies. They painted and stained, planted flowers, cut grass, spread sand at the beach, and spread gravel in the driveway. And finally, when Northern Eagle was ready, the sun came out.

and her husband, Wesley, first came here in 1967. No one else has been here that long and only about ten other families even come close.

"We had bought a trailer and wanted to come north," she recalls after the opening ceremonies, postponing her hot-dog-and-salad lunch to do a little reminiscing. "We went to the information centre in Minden to ask where we'd find a good park and they recommended Northern Eagle. When we got here, we asked to look around and Helen Robertson said, go right ahead. Well, we decided to stay here that summer and we never went anywhere else. In those days, there weren't many people here. I think only seven sites were occupied.

"Helen was so good to everyone. She knew everybody in the park by their first names. She knew when you were coming up and she'd put a welcome sign on your picnic table with your name on it. At Christmas, every family would get a letter — not a card, a letter — from her. And if anything happened in your family, you'd hear from her.

"And the place was a mass of flowers because she's such an avid gardener. At first, I was bored here and looking for something to do. So I asked Helen if I could plant a rock garden and she said sure."

When the Norsworthys came to Northern Eagle, their four children were all grown and had children of their own. Now her two sons also have lots in the campground and Mabel has her great-grandchildren around. "They all love it up here," she says, "the whole family."

When Mabel heard in the spring of 1991 that their bit of heaven might be sold for development, it put a scare into her. "I thought I'd be out and I didn't know what I was going to do. I live in Oshawa and I'm in an apartment all winter. When spring arrives, coming here is the first thing I think of."

As her daughter-in-law Bonney says, "We were in anxiety about losing the park. You build up so many memories and so many friendships, it becomes part of your life."

If you think trailer parks are for second-class transients, you should meet Mabel Norsworthy.

So when Mabel's sons heard about the plan to form an association to buy the park, they were not among the people who were sceptical or resistant to the idea. They were just glad to be able to buy in.

But things weren't that simple for Mabel — and some people knew it. "Four or five families approached the purchasing committee and said, if she can't stay, we won't stay. So they made a special arrangement for me. They kept my site as a rental one just for me. I can't sell it or put it in my will, the way the boys could theirs, but it's mine for as long as I come here. It was really very generous of them."

Looking back on the past year, Mabel recalls that it was "a very hard, sad time for everybody — this year is very different."

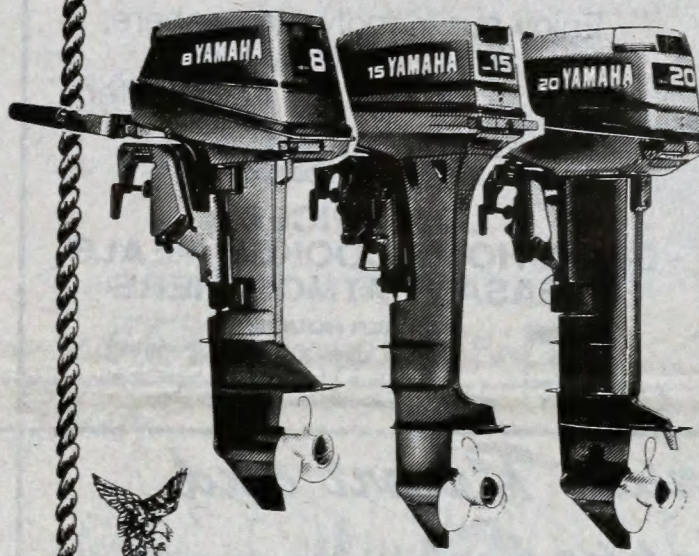

That difference is evident in the happy, proud mood of the crowd gathered to listen to the speeches and witness the ribbon-cutting and drink the champagne. They applaud and cheer at the slightest excuse. They also acknowledge the debt they owe Linda, Gary, and Derek by presenting each of them with a plaque that begins, "Our heartfelt thanks . . ." A similar plaque carrying all three names will hang in the recreation hall.

The party will carry on all day and into the evening. There will be games and contests during the afternoon: log sawing, nail hammering, tug of war, face painting, golf. After a pot luck supper in the evening, a dance will be held in the recreation hall. And the spirit of celebration will linger among the campers of Northern Eagle for a long while yet. For this place is their place now, as it has never been before.

A parade of bicycles and riders, decked out in costumed finery, marshalled in front of the old hotel, now the recreation hall.

Tips for a safe barbecue season

More than 200,000 propane-fuelled barbecues are purchased by Canadians every year and, on most nice summer days, some three million gas barbecues are in use in Canada. But because they're so easy to use, these appliances are sometimes taken for granted and are not given maintenance or safety checks, as they should be.

Propane-fuelled barbecues are quick to light, easy to control, fast and practical, and they come in a wide variety of shapes and sizes. But one thing they all have in common: they need to be maintained and operated in safely and efficiently. The Propane Gas Association of Canada has a few tips that will make using your propane barbecue a safe and enjoyable experience this summer.

Checking the Barbecue

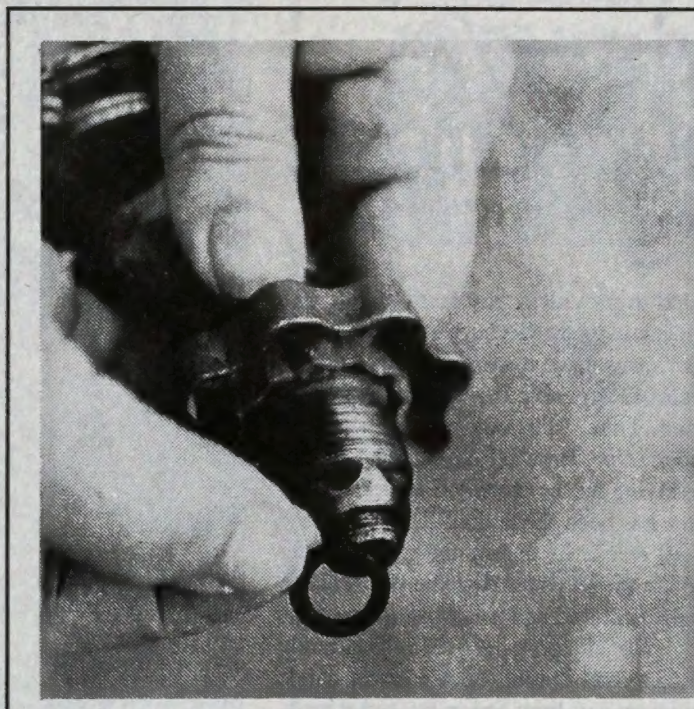

When assembling a new unit, follow the manufacturers instructions carefully. If in doubt, take it back to the store or dealer, or call a qualified propane service technician.

On all barbecues, make certain that the burner ports are free of rust and dirt, and that the burner gas supply throat (the tube connected to the burner) is clear of dust, dirt, and cobwebs.

Test the propane fittings that run from the tank to the barbecue to make sure they don't leak. To do this, make up a solution of dishwashing soap and water; one cup of water with a tablespoon of soap will do. With the barbecue connected to the propane cylinder, turn the barbecue valve off and the propane tank cylinder on. Spread the soapy solution generously over all hose connections and fittings, and all over the hose. If bubbles appear and then become larger or more numerous, you have a leak. Never check for leaks with an open flame.

If you have a leak, turn off the propane cylinder valve and replace the hose and fittings or have them checked and repaired by a qualified propane service technician.

There's another item to watch. On many barbecues, the male nozzle-type fitting of the hose that screws into the propane cylinder has a rubber "O" ring on the end. If you have this type of barbecue, check that ring every time you connect the hose and fitting to a propane cylinder and replace the "O" ring if it appears cracked, torn, or out of round (see photograph).

Lighting and storing your barbecue

When lighting any gas barbecue, have the match or lighter already burning with the barbecue lid open before you turn on the barbecue gas control valve.

Never move the barbecue after it has been lit.

When you are finished, turn off both the barbecue gas control valve(s) and the propane cylinder valve.

Use gas grills outdoors only and always store propane cylinders upright and outdoors.

Transport and use propane cylinders only in the upright, vertical position. When transporting a cylinder (back from having it filled, for example), wedge it into an upright position, make certain it will stay in that position, and leave your trunk or vehicle windows open.

Whenever a propane cylinder is not attached to an appliance, the cylinder valve must be closed and plugged with a POL (Put On Left) plastic plug.

Filling the field with dreams

Baseball fever builds as final tournament nears

by Russ Duhaime

The heavy wooden bat was an enormous weight in the sweaty grasp of the batter as he pawed at the dry red soil in front of the plate. He'd spent the better part of the summer with that bat in his hands, shagging flies with friends in the school yard, at batting practice and at the dozens of games that season. The white tape spiralling up the handle was worn ragged from the continual wrenching of fists hunting for a better grip, and the signature label imprinted on the grain side of the bat was completely obliterated.

Normally this bat felt like a natural extension of his arms, but this day it felt heavy and slow. Any bat would feel this way, though, when Gus Gazola was at the delivery end of the ball. His pitches were a white blur that left most batters dumfounded by the resonant smack of the ball hitting the catcher's mit.

Twisting the threadbare tape through his white-knuckled grip one last time, the batter dug in for Gus's first delivery. Midway through the windup he began a slow lamentering swing, expecting to hear only the wind and the dreadful smack leather on leather. Instead, the bat found its quarry above the plate and the crack of splitting wood surprised the fielders almost as much as it surprised the batter. The bat was shattered but the ball was sending up a small cloud of white lime dust beyond third base where it skipped off the base line. The hit amounted only to a single, but it ended Gus's string of no-hit games.

Of all the trophies handed out at the awards banquet at the end of that season, none could compare to that splintered bat. I still have it.

My most vivid memories of summer are of the days on the green grass with the sun on my back and a glove on my hand. And now, thanks to the sponsors, umpires, coaches and other assorted volunteers, hundreds of kids in Minden are creating memories of their own on the ball diamonds.

More than 300 young ball players turn the Minden diamonds into a beehive of activity three nights each week. Ranging in age from three to 17, the players square off in friendly competition each Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday. On these nights the bleachers are always filled with fans cheering on their favourite team. Umpires belt out their calls, usually to the chagrin of at least one cheering squad. There's chatter on the benches, on the bleachers and in the field. And through it all, kids (and parents) are having fun.

Minor baseball was initiated three years ago by a small group of residents who wanted to provide a new form of summer recreation in town. Meetings were held, plans made, sponsors contacted, schedules drawn up, clinics organized and equipment purchased. That's the nuts and bolts of the Minden Minor Baseball Association, but the true driving force behind the success of this league has been the enthusiasm of players. For 10 weeks in the summer, they bring action to the fields and breathe youthful life into the hearts of us former ball players.

The all-too-brief season is already nearing its end. On July 26, the season winds up with a day-long action-packed tournament. On that Sunday the rivalries that have evolved in all the leagues will be settled. The tournament begins early in the morning and continues through almost until dusk with all diamonds continually active. Contests and raffles add to the excitement.

The taste of roasted hot dogs, the sounds of cheering fans and the sweet smell of the grass all come together for that one long day on the diamonds. And I'll be watching at the end of the day for someone leaving the park with a little extra pride in his step and a splintered bat under his arm.

Although the ball season is winding down, spirits are soaring at the Minden ball diamonds. With the final tournament approaching on July 26, the competition is growing more intense. Left, a player from the General Lees team nervously waits his turn at bat during a game in the 5--pitch league Tuesday night. Above, it's a long trip from third to home in a race against the throw.

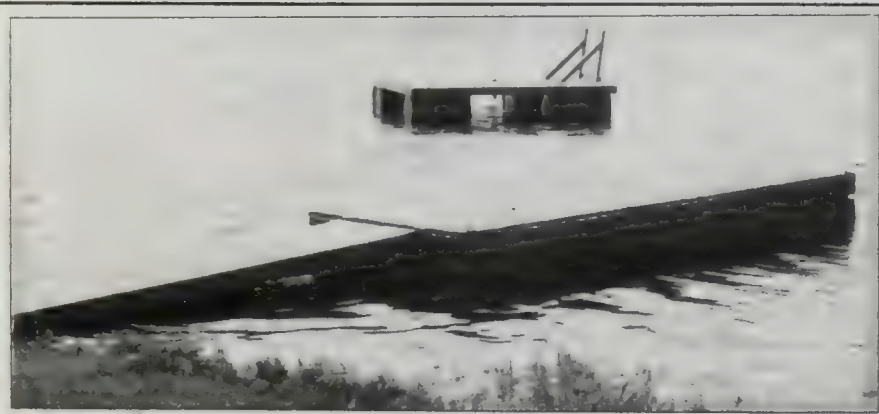

A white blur

The bat was a bit slower than the ball as this player attempted to connect during Northland Sales' game against General Lees on Tuesday night. The action is intense as the leagues prepare for the final tournament in the Minden Minor Baseball Association. Tournament day is July 26.

A song for him and a song for her

This article is reprinted from the current issue of The Raven, the Algonquin Park newsletter.

We don't have to tell anybody that Algonquin Park is filled with bird songs at this time of year. Long before dawn, the chorus begins; it build to a peak just after sunrise, subsides around midday, (especially in hot weather), then picks up again late in the afternoon and continues to, or past, sunset.

We dare say that everybody enjoys all this singing, but probably just as a sort of general background music. Most people would probably be quite intimidated by the idea of actually identifying all the "instruments" (bird species) in the avian orchestra. And yet, there is a lot to be said for doing just that — and the task of teasing apart all those different songs is not nearly as difficult as you might think.

With today's multitude of excellent bird-song recordings, not to mention the numerous visual field guide books, it's surprisingly easy to get yourself started in the fun of learning to identify birds, not just by sight, but by sound as well. Believe us, if we can do it with our distinctly unmusical ears, you can too!

And we can't emphasize too much just how much pleasure and interest can be derived from such an ability. It is rewarding in the extreme to be able to stand in one spot and put names on all the invisible songsters out there. Instead of merely being inundated by meaningless music, however beautiful it may be, you are instead surrounded by dozens of different forest creatures. And even if you can see them all, you know they are out there and the instantaneous name and mental image that you can attach to each song adds a whole new dimension to a walk in the forest.

Chestnut-sided Warbler

It is also one of the most interesting warblers in the sense that the great early naturalist, Jean Jacques Audubon, saw only three in his lifetime, whereas today it is abundant.

Chestnut-sided warblers like brushy, sunny openings in the forest and they have apparently benefitted greatly from logging and other forest-disturbing activities of man. Around Algonquin Park campgrounds, for example, they are one of the commonest of all birds and everybody has heard hundreds of times (even if they didn't know it) the sweet song usually remembered as "please, please, pleased to MEET cha". The catch

Every once in a while, you will hear a weird song, one that reminds you of no other bird you know. And yet, when you track it down, you find that it is a very familiar bird whose song you thought you knew perfectly well.

There is one little catch, however. Every once in a while, you will hear a totally weird song not to be heard on commercially available bird recordings, one that reminds you of no other bird you know. And yet, when you track it down, you find that it is a very familiar bird whose song you thought you knew perfectly well.

One of the best examples of this is afforded by our common little chestnut-sided warbler. It is one of our prettiest warblers with a bright yellow cap, black streaks on a greenish back, and conspicuous chestnut-coloured bands running down each side and contrasting with the white throat and breast.

though, as every bird-listener in Algonquin Park eventually finds out, is that the chestnut-sided warbler also has a completely different song as well. This is a jumbly series of notes, lacking the emphatic ending of the normal song (the "to MEET cha" part), which must be learned separately.

For a long time, we just accepted the fact that chestnut-sided warblers had two song types without really knowing why. For all we knew, some individual males always sang the primary song (the one with MEET-cha at the end), while other males exclusively sang the other, secondary song. Or, if all males really did sing both songs, we had no idea under what circumstances one might be used instead of the other.

Now, however, we have a pretty good idea of what the two songs mean. Dr. Donald Kroodsma of the University of Vermont, by patient observation and experiment, has worked it all out for us. The primary song (which is the same throughout the large range of the chestnut-sided warbler) is sung by males to attract females. The secondary song (which varies considerably from one region to another) is used for threatening rival males in territorial disputes.

Armed with this knowledge, we can start to make sense of the two song-types of the chestnut-sided warbler and of their use. When the males get back to the Park in mid-May, for example, they space themselves out in appropriate habitat and pour out their primary song in an effort to attract a female. They may well sing as often as 300 times an hour from sunrise to sunset — which adds up to an amazing 4,000 love songs a day. Interspersed into the otherwise almost non-stop primary songs, however, will be short bursts of secondary songs. These occur when one male encroaches onto the territory of another.

When the females finally do return to Algonquin, about a week after the males,

Wild Space

Beautiful Killer

As summer unfolds, a silent killer lurks along roadsides, ditches, shorelines, and meadows, shrouding the landscape in a soft purple veil. This exotic beauty slowly takes its toll on the environment as it chokes the life out of wetlands and waterways, destroying precious wildlife habitat. The aggressive invader is purple loosestrife.

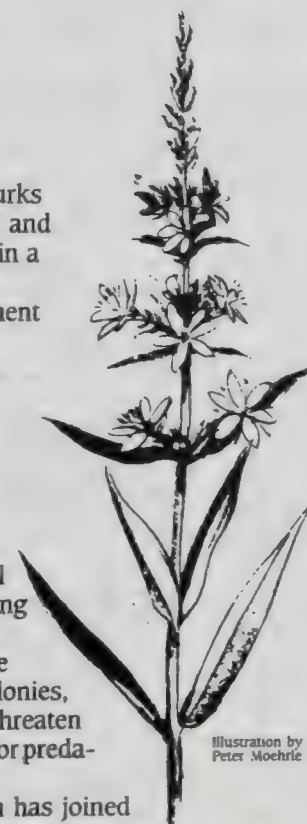

Originally found in Europe and Asia, purple loosestrife is a hardy flowering plant that was accidentally introduced to North America in the 1800s. Because it has no natural enemies, it is spreading at an alarming rate throughout Canada.

Purple loosestrife has no nutritive value for wildlife. And its shoreline colonies, which stand one to two metres tall, threaten young waterfowl by providing cover for predators on the prowl.

The Canadian Wildlife Federation has joined the fight against this pesky weed, and you can help too. Simply drop us a line, and we'll send you a brochure entitled Beautiful Killer. In it you'll find a survey that we'd like you to fill out and return to us. Information from the survey will help us determine the location and severity of purple loosestrife infestation, which in turn will help in the design of a Canada-wide control program for the "purple plague."

Seemingly random use of songs really does make sense

they of course know nothing about the territorial boundaries carved out by the males and have no particular reason to respect them, even if they did. They are very much in "shopping mode" and they wander about before choosing a male with whom to settle. Until they do, eager males pursue them, repeatedly singing "please, please, please to MEET cha". These pursuits often taken them into the territories of neighbouring males, who naturally respond to the intrusions by blasting the trespasser male with secondary songs. A human listener, unable to see the details of such heavy-duty courtship, will therefore be treated at this stage to a confusing mix of both primary and secondary songs.

A few days later, when each female has chosen her mate and come to know and stay inside his territorial boundaries, the males have little reason to keep sing the female-attracting primary song. Trespass by male neighbours, however, continues to be a serious problem, particularly because they will try to mate with the resident female in the pre-egg period when she is most fertile. The primary preoccupation of a territory-holding male at this time is defence against trespass and that is why he now sings secondary songs almost non-stop (whereas just a week earlier, the same bird would have been singing almost nothing but primary songs).

Thus, the otherwise bewildering and seemingly unpredictable switching back and forth between the two song-types of the chestnut-sided warbler really does make some sort of sense. It is rather neatly explained by the shifting social circumstances in which the male warblers find themselves.

We have always appreciated the challenge of putting names on all those invisible singers and now we have the additional possibility of knowing what they are doing. With chestnut-sided warblers at least, we can even hear the males trying to talk the sweet-talk the females one minute and threaten rival males the next. How fascinating to think that the hundreds of individual melodies washing over us from unseen jewels in the tree tops each carry so much hidden meaning. Among all that soothing background music, there is a song for each and every species and, as we now know, there is sometimes even a song for him and a song for her.

The practical side of listening to bird songs

One practical advantage of being able to identify birds by ear is that it enables us to assess bird populations without having to see the birds. Songbird populations have declined drastically in many parts of North America in recent years and considerable effort is being devoted to finding out why.

Some authorities feel that the clearing of tropical forests may be depriving "our" birds of vital winter habitat. Other people worry that songbirds in the increasingly fragmented patches of forest in eastern North America just can't withstand the pressure from cats, raccoons, blue jays, cowbirds, and other species whose numbers are artificially propped up by human beings living all around the forest fragments.

One way to shed some light on the question is to study bird populations in really big tracts of forest like Algonquin Park. If the problem is decreasing winter habitat in the tropics, Canadian songbirds should be equally affected, whether they live in a woodlot near Toronto or in the middle of the Park. On the other hand, if the problem is really predators like cats and nest predators like cowbirds, both of which have been helped enormously by things like bird feeders and farming, then birds living close to people should be at far greater risk than birds living here in Algonquin.

The Canadian Wildlife Service has launched a program to monitor forest bird populations in Canada. The chief technique is to count singing males from one year to the next at specially laid-out plots. Algonquin Park staff are participating in the program on a volunteer basis and we have three plots that we try to do at least every two years. One is in the hardwoods behind the Park Museum, one is in the hardwoods west of the Canis Bay day-use area, and the third is in the big hemlock stand on the Bat Lake Trail. Results so far have shown some ups and downs in individual species, but it's too early to say whether there are any real long-term trends.

SPOT THE SHOT

Our camera panned north to the fair shores of Eagle Lake to capture a scene for the third contest in our Spot The Shot extravaganza. Just east of the settlement's "downtown" intersection, across the one-lane bridge and to the left, you'll find this tranquil spot. A favourite location for picnics, it features a great sand beach with easy parking nearby. The water of Eagle Lake gently laps the shore; under the bridge, the outflow crashes headlong into one segment of the Gull River. The view from the bridge is lovely in both directions. Downstream, the river babbles through a rock-strewn bed. On the other side, you can gaze across the lake to the green hills. As we have discovered in the past, it is not unusual for the winner of the contest to come from the nearby community. Marion Vanschaik is our winner this time and she lives, you guessed it, in Eagle Lake. Our congratulations to her; the prize is on the way. But you don't have to live near "The Spot" to tell us where the picture was taken. Have a look at this shot and take a guess.

Our prize may not measure up in size to those offered by the Ontario Lottery Corporation, but your chances of having it all to yourself are certainly better. $25 in refrigerated dollars is what we're offering if you can identify the scene shown above. The winning entry will be selected at random from all the correct answers received. Send your name, address, and phone number to the address listed below. Remember: the deadline for entries to this contest is July 28. The winner will be announced in the August 3 edition of This Week in the Highlands. Send your entry to: Spot The Shot, Contest No. 5, c/o The Times, P. O. Box 97, Minden, Ontario, K0M 2K0. We'll also accept your entry in person, if you wish to drop it off during business hours at The Times office, 134 Bobcaygeon Road North, Minden, or fax it to us at (705)286-4768. Good luck!
